Learning Styles

I think learning styles do play a part in how we learn. Although, I do not think it is as important as some make it out to be. Some people use it as a victim get out of jail free card. They want to be catered to, and when it does not happen and they fail they want to blame it on something other than themselves. The most important part about how you learn is when you get to your house and there is no teacher over your shoulder and you need to get the work done. What do you do? It is more of a habit kind of thing to me rather than a “who you are” and something that can not be changed. It also heavily depends on someone’s culture, as well as their parents and how their parents raised them to prepare for school. Culture is going to play a huge role compared to someone’s learning style.
